

Jewel - Scout

The English army can't lead itself—but you can. Not command it, of course, but who shall first walk the path it takes? Thou art Jewel, a military scout for the King of England himself. You're agile, quiet, and have a sharp eye for dangerous terrain. Three days ago, thy leave was granted: before the French arrive and whilst the English camp, thou art free to enjoy the harvest faire.

...or so your cover story goes. It's true that thy work serves the King, but it's nature is more circumspect even than that of the scouting corps. An agent of the Secret Police, thou must root out any danger to the crown (may He live on) and your nation. With the dastardly French camped so close, it's a nigh inevitability their agents and sympathizers slink about the faire, spreading dissent and treason amongst the common folk. Thy duty is clear: by the end of today's faire, thou must've issued warrants for the arrest of at least two such traitors—and indeed, they must be treasonous, if you're to protect the crown.

Indeed, those are your standing orders. But you've been dispatched by the Spymistress herself for a cause of urgent import: the French battle plans were briefly stolen before being lost. If thou could recover them, imagine the red tide thy beloved army would wash over the French aggressors!

The Spymistress asked one additional task of you: a fellow agent, Peter, was murdered just yesterday—possibly by the French. Find and issue a warrant for the snake who did this.

Be sure to account for thine own safety, and stay focused—crime and Cults play second or third fiddle when there are traitors to England about. For King and country!
